Do both represent the same thing? I.e. is it just the way the language handles it or something else I don't know about? A: In general, they are not the same thing and there are differences, which have to do with OOP. Your first example defines a data member of a class, which is visible to all instances of the class. While this works, you can only use it where the class itself is accessible. Your second example defines a class level data member which is visible to all instances of the class, but only in that class. But the main difference between the two is the visibility. The first case is an example of what is called "Static members", and the second is an example of what is called "Shared members". Imagine what would happen if you have two classes (in C#) public class ClassA { public static int Number; } public class ClassB { public int Number; } If you now tried to access a class instance of ClassA from within ClassB, the method of inheritance will not allow you to access the value of ClassA.Number. However, if you had the following code: public 82138339de
