Borrowing is a family concern in the US, as the average American household owes $16,755, according to a Borrow.com survey. When taking out a loan, consumers tend to select the option that offers the lowest cost. As a result, the average loan for the population is the same, regardless of the type of loan. Nowadays, the average American will take out $17,277 in student loans, $16,755 in auto loans and $5,715 in a mortgage, according to an investigation from MoneyTips. Borrow.com tracked the borrowing habits of 18,000 consumers, and it found that Americans tend to opt for a low-interest rate, rather than taking on a higher monthly payment for cash. "Americans apparently like to borrow money. But they also understand that the right loan can be the best option," said Borrow.com founder and CEO Greg McBride. "As the interest rates dip from their historic highs, consumers are looking for a package that may not cost them more every month but guarantees that they don't pay more interest overall." Not only do Americans tend to opt for a low-interest rate, they also select payment methods that offer the lowest monthly rate. In this case, interest rates for an auto loan are 15 percent higher than for a mortgage. The average loan for the 18,000 surveyed Americans is $16,755, even if it is a higher-interest-rate loan, McBride said. He also noted that consumers tend to take out just enough money to finance a purchase to make it "smooth" financially. "They tend to borrow based on how much they need and not based on how much they can afford," McBride said. Why do Americans like to borrow? e79caf774b
