Feel the angst: Warmoesstraat Warmoesstraat is a street with a lot of history in the center of Amsterdam. Currently, it leads the stratospheric rise of the value of this area as an alternative to the center. The first part of the street is mostly occupied by a grocery store, Pylk, and a handful of tall office buildings. This will change soon as a market, a restaurant, and a boutique hotel are being built there. The interesting part of the street is the transition between two districts, Kaaiholt and Muziekgebouw, with the tall office buildings to the right and the restaurants and hotels to the left. On the sidewalk, below the building façades, there is the sky and the river, a perfect harmony. There are many wonderful buildings in this area, a mix of 20th and 21st century architecture. The commercial building with the sharp roof has a presence that seems to say "I'm the way." Other examples are the buildings with the glass façades that seem to say "I'm really cool." The trees let the air pass through into the sidewalks and create a rhythm of their own. The bricks are a historical reminder of the other, more pleasant streets of Amsterdam, and the open space is a nice touch. The best thing about the street is the feeling of anticipation, as if everything is about to start. The contract has not yet been signed for the houses on the right side of the street, but the façades are already completed. The apartment houses are being built along the sidewalks, more like sound stages. The wood is left bare, allowing the small details to appear. The colors of the houses seem to vary, and the windows are contrasted by the dark sky and the bright red roofs. Although the houses are far from each other, the sky and the river run seamlessly through the houses. These houses are private houses. When the commercial building with the sharp roof has opened, the landscape will change. The last part of the street to be completed will be the hotel. In the meantime, these residents are trying to make the best of the limited time they have. The stock market 6d1f23a050
